"There's No Love in Basketball" by Randall Eisenhorn: Kevin Miller is a handsome basketball jock, famous for his machismo and his skill with the ladies. What no one knows is that his entire persona is an act. Kevin is actually gay, and in a committed, long-term relationship with one of his posse, a rugged musclegod who goes by Gargoyle. When his delicate balance of heterosexual appearances and homosexual lifestyles is destroyed by a reporter, Kevin is forced to make a terrible choice. His love and lust for Gargoyle is true, but so is his need to be a basketball star. Kevin is blackmailed into submission, and must come to understand that there is no love in basketball.

"Soccer Jocks Downlow" by Oliver Kramden: Keyon Mabanje is a soccer star and ladies' heartthrob in his native Malawi, where he and his team dominate the competition. But a disastrous loss sets him on an uncomfortable journey of self-discovery that takes him from the arms of the team's personal trainer to his teammate and best friend Lukas. Keyon and Lukas are forced to hide their feelings, even from each other at first, until their love and passion threatens to conquer their lives, careers and reputations.

"Prison in My Day" by Curtis Kingsmith: Wendell "Thumper" White is a champion boxer sidelined by charges related to the accidental death of an opponent in the ring. With the possibility of prison time over his head, Wendell's uncle and grandfather warn him of the sexual dangers and intrigues that come with being locked up. But Wendell is more excited than fearful about that aspect of prison life and comes to enjoy his family's lessons.
